CHAPTER XXXIV. "DAMEN THE TORPEDOES! GO AREAD!" N the confusion, the men of the 到I Hartford got the idea that the Tecumeeh had sunk the Ten-nessee. They leaped on the rail and cheered madly in their exultation, and the crews of the other shins. deceived also, joined in the acclaim But the admiral your not deceived. He had noted the whole disaster. He saw the men in the water too. Instantly he called to Peyton:

"Take one of the boats of the Metacomet, Peyton, and try to save those men. Give him a boat, Jouett!"

"Aye, aye, sir," replied that cool young officer as Peyton clambered over to the Metacomet's deck, gathered a boat's crew as he ran, dropped into one of the cutters dragging along to pulled out around the ੰsteਜਾ the Hartford right into the hell of battle to starboard.

That was not the only disaster of the morning, however, for the Brooklyn, which was in the lead, sundenly stop-

"What's the matter with the Brook lyn, Freeman?" cited Farragut, hailing the pilot "She must have plenty of water there."-

"Plenty and to spare, admiral." Why does she stop then?'

But she did more than stop. Though that was disastrous enough, she began to back down upon the Hartford and the rest of the first. Indeed this action of the Brooklyfi was the only cloud on the glory of that day

The leading ships were right under the guns of the fort now, a few hunured tards away - The fire from Mobile point was territic. As the Brooklyn backed her belm was shifted, and she turned her bows straight to the fort. Her broadside no longer bore, and her position in a measure blanketed the other ships. The men in the fort and in the water battery, quick to see the disadvantage of the fleet, spring to their guns again and, taking deliberate airı at point blank range, began to rake the hapless Brooklyn from stem to stern. The splinters liferally flow from her in sheets. Shot after shot best into her, shell after shell ripped through her, and she could make no reply to this fearful fire. If the gun ners in the fort had only depressed their guns, she must have been sunk then and there," Her decks began to look like a slaughter pen. The Martford and the Richmond also came under a fearful fire. The ships were almost silent and no guns bearing, while Port Morgan roared and seethed with hell and destruction.

What's the matter?" roured the admiral, his face clouded with anxiety "Send me an army signal officer," he shouted in a shrlll voice that was heard even above the commotion.

In a moment the man reported that the Brooklyn was signaling "torpedoes "head," She had seen a line of suell boxes thrown out by the Tennessee and her consorts and had inistaken them for torpedoes. This in conjunction with the loss of the Tecumseh and the marrol mess of the channel through which he was expected to pass and its nearness to the fort had consed the captain first to stop and then to attempt to back his ship. He was beaten

The six leading ships were now huddled together in serious danger of colusion under the guns of the fort which were deliberately ripping them to pieces with heavy show The high masts di fore rlearly indicated their position and enabled the gunners in the fort and of the Confederate squadron to and them easily in spite of the smoke. To hesitate was to lose everything. It was that crucial moment of the battle up on the instant decision of which de

Admiral Farragut used to tell how at that moment he breathed a brief prayer to the God in whom he trusted. saying, "Shall I go on?" and the an Sy er came in a voice which seemed to him audible in that storm of battle, "Go on" That was what he did What he said was vast'y different, -

When he learned that it was fear of torpoles that had backed the Brook lyn and swung her athwart the chan-nel, he shouted out in these slarp tones at at could be heard everywhere on the strp

'Dam, the terpedoes Four bells, Drayton' Full speed, Jouett! Back the dignes of the Metacomet-1 and and tuen go alicad!"

The one sicking, the other going afield, Farragut swung his flagship across the Drooklyn's stern—it was im possible to cross her bows in the posi tion she then was or he would have done so-and dashed at full speed up the channel. He was forced to skirt the shoal as he did so, and there were but a few feet of water beneath his Leel as he rushed on.

"We cannot pass to the eastward of the buoy now, sir," said the pilot, as. they cleared the Brooklyn. "The monitors are right in the way in the chan-

"Straight ahead" roared the ad-"Right at the line!"

At full speed now the Hartford, en veloped in flame and smoke from her own guns, rushed for the deadly for pedo lire. Broadside after broadside went smashing into the fort as she swept magnificently on. Would she

The men below on the Hertford and the Metacomet heard a series of detonations as if musketry were being exploded beneath the Ecol Tho primers of the torpedoes as the mighty ship struck them snapped one after mother, but the salt water had rendered the deadly infernal machines in-That and the admiral's forethought in going, in with the flood tide, which turned the percussion caps away from the onrushing ships, saved him.

In a moment he was safe over the line. It was a few minutes, after 8 o'clock. Griin and black before him loomed the Tennesses and the gun boats ahead of her their position giv ing them immunity-raking the Hart ford again and again. The Tennessee made for the flagship as if to ram, but by clover manenvering and her faster speed the Hartford prevented this. The two vessels exchanged broadsides, however, and shells from the Tennessee Dasted through the wooden ship.

sides of the Tennessee. Shot and shell were coming in from all sides on the Hartford, still within range of the fort, and so rapidly were her own guns served that she looked like a shill on fire. A ghastly precession of wounded men were being sent to the codipit, and the decks were correct with dead men weltering in their blood the carnage was fourful. Meanwhile inspired by the example while the solid shot from the Hartford rebounded harmlessly from the iron of the admial, the Brooklyn got her head-around at last and, followed by the Richmon and the Pensacola and the others, rished desperately for the torpedo line, the captains thinking to go to a noble death with their admiral. Giving to their analety and hurry the regular order was alardoned, and the slops passed up as they rould, shets of flume and smoke pouring from beir broadsides upon the fort. Some of the ships passed perfloasty near he should in the conf reien At one time the Richmond had less than a foot of water under her keel

Together the two watched through the long night. The boy slept heavily at first, but as the effects of the opiate wore away the persistent pain made him restless. Toward morning he drifted into consciousness again, as he had drifted into sleep the night before. The sleep had given him He was visibly weaker no strength. than he had been and the agonies he suffered were terrible, not only to bear,

Well, it would soon be over. It was morning, and Beverly was no better, only he was nearing the end. There was something in that . The surgeon had come and gone with a despairing shake of his head, the general had stooped over him once more and had left him ,with tears in his eyes. . He was an old soldier, he had seen many people die, few had affected him as did this lad. Little groups of his comrades had come in, tiptoed over to the bed, gazed stently and sympathetically on him and had gone out again without word. Sometimes he recognized them, sometimes he did not

His suffering was so keen that all his physical faculties were drawn up into it, and it was only in brief inter mittent periods of comparative respité that he took cognizance of things about him. Sometimes he muttered incoherently, but generally_what he said was sufficiently intelligible. By and by the pale grayness of the dawn rese-colored the east. The light of the rising sun presently leaped through the open door, the casemate. flooding Dr. Bampner rose and put out the lamp. After awhile a beam fell across the bed whereon the boy lay. It was broad daylight now and there came to him one of those rare moments of comparative case. He opened his eyes and saw the light on the wall.

"Morning," he murmured; "no bettêr?

er?" There was a sudden flerce rattle of drums outside, the shrilling of a trumpet. The peaceful silence of that summer morning was broken by hurried commands the rush of many-feet, shouts and cries; the creak of tackles, as the huge guns were loaded and pre-pared for action, which filled the room with a dreadful note of preparation. "What's that call?" he whispered hoarsely. "It's the assembly." he cried, his voice growing stronger. They must be coming up at last must go to the lamparts. Duty!"

He actually lifted blungelf on his hands and rose in his bod. For a sec and they stored at him, horrified at his appearance. Then he fell slowly his appearance. Then he fell slowly back on the hed, a helpless look on his face, whiter than the linen of the pil-

Oh, Peyton, Peyton, what power had ou over this woman's heart that even at this moment she could think of you? She dropped upon her knees by the bed and selzed the lifeless hand of her brother and laid her forehead upon it, mûrmuring again and again, as if could not get away from the idea, War, war!"

"Ah, my dear, war is terrible," said the old doctor, tenderly smoothing her hair as it swept the cover and then drawing her gently away. "But there on the bed is peace at last. Thank God for it!"

They were not allowed to cherish their grief alone or for long, however, for as Dr. Bampney spoke a body of men crowded through the casemate door. The casemate was in the curtain which was protected by the water battery and was probably the safest place in the fort. For that reason they had turned it into a hospital. The men who entered it bore of a rude stretcher a frightfully injured soldier, who had been terribly torn by an exploding shell. And there were other wounded and dying also that followed hard upon the first in that hour of battle. As she thought of that afterward they proved the salvation of the woman. They gave her something to do. Her mind was reeling under the shock, but she gave herself to the wounded, and that distracted her from ber grief." She did not forget—no, never that—but in serving others she found strength to bear her own burden. There were so few who could be spared to look after the wounded, and she and Dr. Bampney rendered good service to the surgeon and his assistants

But when the battle was over and the strain relayed she had to take cognizance again of that smail boyish figure under the white sheet covering it from head to foot, while she wondered dianly if Boyd Peyton, too, had There was another wall, followed been significed to the Insatishie war with feverish imputance, then: god that ruled the land

A deep sigh broke from the lips of Mrs. Peyton at this confirmation of the news. Tempe was right, then. She had heard the two fifteen inch guns of the Tecumseh. A murmur of conversation broke out in the room again, to be instantly hushed at the calling of the sounder:

"Beverly—Annan—Just—died." "My brother," wailed little Temps bitterly, bursting into the noisy tears of childhood.

Pink Peyton, herself almost heartbroken for her lover as well as her father and brothers, gathered the little waif to her breast and strove to soothe her agitation. She would have given worlds to have wept herself.

Men crowded around the operator seated before the trembling key, their breath coming quickly, their faces red or pale according to their temperament, as the story of the tremendous action thirty miles away was clicked off in broken sentences from the tenuous wire. But when the rattling of the key broke in upon those in the room, all other noises died away; and they held their breaths to listen. There were many men in that room who would have given all they possessed to have been in the battle. Their desires as well as their characteristics were indicated in their positions, in the way they listened, in the looks that came over their faces.

altered, not the means which he must employ in order to achieve his smoition. He must possess the mental strength, the SOUND JUDG-MENT OF MEN AND . THINGS, the keen analysis of business rendencies and the general intelligence that can solve the problems of commerce.

He requires, in other words, the PRACTICAL EDUCATION that cannot always be acquired in the higher schools of learning.

THE LAD WHO COMMENCES HIS CAREER AS AN OFFICE BOY IN A COMMERCIAL HOUSE GENERALLY OUTSTRIPS THE UNIVER-SITY GRADUATE, WHO IS HANDICAPPED IN THE RACE OF LIFE BY THE FACT THAT HE LIVES IN AN ATMOSPHERE OF THEO-RETICAL KNOWLEDGE UNTIL HE-IS TWENTY-THREE YEARS OF

Such training is serviceable only to members of the learned professions. The leaders in the world of commerce are almost always sell made men, whose minds have been sharpened in the school of experience. This practical and intelligent grasp of a business proposition, this constantly increasing acquaintance with business principles, is of slow and gradual growth.

The boy who begins his career with the set purpose of doing his full duty to his employers and of acquiring a maximum knowledge of buciness methods in every position or department to which he is raised by his integrity, his reliability, his devotion to work, HIS WILLINGNESS TO REACH HIS OFFICE, IN TIME AND TO BE THE LAST TO- LEAVE HIS POST, acquires a character the value of which will be inevitably recognized by his superiors.

THE MOST IMPORTANT FACTOR OF SUCCESS IS TRAINED IN-TELLIGENCE.

What would this world be, what would our civilization be, were it not for the men who work with their hands?

I AM ONE WHO WANTS TO SEE PEACE, AN HON-ORABLE PEACE, BETWEEN LABOR AND CAPITAL. I went to do my share to establish the best, and if I have one ambition, over another it is to see in West Virginia a relationship established between the miners and operators of West Virginia that will be for Cats to Kill Prairie Dogs The owners of an enormous sheep ranch in Montana suffer so much loss from the consumption by praine dogs of the tender shoots of grass, that they have determined to import cats enough to exterminate the dogs. The first company of 100 cats is being re-cruited at St. Paul. A facetions writer in the New York Post shows anxiety for the future of the cats, heir work being accomplished. He says if they de kill the prairie dogs they will have the choice, subsequently, of starvation, carnibalism or brigandage.
