VOL. XLIV. NO. 43.

THE RECORD: NORTHVILLE, MICH., FRIDAY, MAY 22, 1914.

$1.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

FURNISH JUST THE 'LECTRIC JUICE

Plymouth Village Does No Wiring and Furnishes No Supplies.

Superintendent Does It on His Own
Time and Invests Own Money.

Over at Plymouth the superintendent of the electric light plant draws a salary of $250 per month. With this he pays his own help. The village does no wiring and furnishes and sells no fixtures, or supplies of any kind.

People who want wiring done either hire the superintendent to do it or some one else and the purchase of supplies can be made of the superintendent or of outside dealers. The superintendent has what profit he can make on wiring for customers or supplies furnished as long as it does not interfere with the village's work. The village has, however, nothing to do with anything except to furnish "juice."

The village of Northville, it is believed, can with profit adopt this same sort of a system. The furnishing of supplies for wiring houses and buildings in Northville has always been a big item of expense and it is doubtful if the village has ever profited a dollar for all the money and labor invested along this line. Besides that, annoying circumstances and delays have developed in making settlements for work done by the village which would thus be avoided with further benefit to the municipality, in addition to the fact of no unprofitable money investments along unpaying lines.

A number of well known business men have discussed this Plymouth plan with the Record this week and all are enthusiastic in belief that it is far superior to Northville's, and is well worth considering by the council. Anyhow Plymouth people claim their plan, after years of trial, has proved profitable.

BASE (BALL) SLANDER.

It appears that some of the Northville "school boys" are old enough to draw a pension when it comes to qualifying for a place on the base ball team. Holly Herald. We don't blame 'em for withdrawing from the county league if that's the way they feel. So, Lyon Herald.

We used to say the same thing about Holly when they won a game from Northville.

When a person takes real pleasure in writing a letter, it is safe to say that another person will take real pleasure in receiving it. The mere act of writing upon a surface that lends itself to the free use of a pen makes letter-writing easier. ## OAKLAND LIQUOR CASE DECIDED

Judge Smith of Pontiac Hands
Down Important Decision.

The following court decision handed down by Judge Smith of Pontiac will prove of much interest in every village in the state. We copy from the Orion Review:

"The mandamus case of C. A. Farrell, proprietor of the Park Hotel, against the village council, was heard before Judge Smith in the circuit court last week and the court rendered a decision dismissing the petition.

"This was the much talked about proceedings to get the village to approve of the relator's liquor bond and application filed with the village clerk about the 13th of April, at which time there was a village ordinance providing for a $500 local license fee, but was raised to $750, the new ordinance taking effect some ten days later. Mr. Farrell's petition set up the claim that, inasmuch as he had filed his application before the new ordinance went into effect, that he was entitled to last year's rate, of $500.

Numerous other issues were raised in the answer filed by the village, and the court held that the council had full power to make the change and the relator (Mr. Farrell) was bound by the change. The court also passed on the 1911 amendment to the Warner-Crampton liquor law, holding that a village council or township board had power to reject any and all bonds offered.

On Tuesday Mr. Farrell paid the village clerk the amount called for under the last ordinance ($750) and the next day, Mr. Farrell procured his "Red Card" and in the afternoon the Park Hotel was running as usual.

FILES HIS NOMINATION PETITIONS.

L. B. Dickinson Meeting With Hearty Support from all over the State. Loren B. Dickinson of Eaton township, candidate for the Republican nomination for lieutenant governor filed nominating petitions containing 2,000 signatures with the secretary of state Saturday morning.

Mr. Dickinson states that he is meeting with very flattering assurances of support from all over the state, petitions coming in well filled with names on every mail. He is finding very little opposition so far and is very probable that none will materialize. Senator Curtis of Flint, a former Ball Moose, has threatened to enter the lists but will probably not do so. Kent, Clinton Wayne, Genesee and Ingham have been especially strong with petitions for Mr. Dickinson.—Charlotte Tribune.

THE DUST NUISANCE.

The old saying that everybody must sooner or later "eat a peck of dirt" is in a fair way to be proven true of the inhabitants of this village, and some even feel that already they have swallowed more than their personal allotment this present season. The condition of our streets in regard to the dust nuisance has certainly reached a stage that is an absolute disgrace. Talk of disease epidemics! Is there any surer way to "corral" any and every sort of germ that may have changed to find lodgement anywhere within the village limits, than by means of the stifling clouds of dust that choke the passers by and penetrate stores, offices and dwellings every time the wind "breezes up" or any vehicle moves? And no matter how careful our grocers and meat dealers may try to be in protecting their wares, it is utterly impossible to prevent this foul dust from settling on foodstuffs, and penetrating into even the covered receptacles inside the stores, to contaminate articles that cannot be subjected to the process of washing, so we must needs eat it and drink it.

Neighboring towns in all directions have taken the needful official action to do away with the dust danger. Milford, Plymouth and Farmington are using the oil. Other towns are applying the solvay preparation, which is claimed by some to be cheaper and cleaner than the oil, and equally effective. If the small minority objection to the use of oil here must be considered restrictive, then why not try the other substance? We understand that the business men are practically unanimous in wanting the streets oiled, and they claim the delay is due to the unwillingness of members of the utility committee. Meanwhile a condition of actual nuisance to public health and business is allowed to exist. It is surely more than time somebody should wake up and get Northville out of the clouds.

What excuse has the Bull Moose party longer to live? Aid McCarthy of Detroit gives notice that he has deserted them to again become a G. O. P.

If it keeps on, the White House will be as good a marriage bureau as the Northville schools.

Hughes Jennings gets out of Boston with his finger in the neck of time.

W. R. C. NOTES.

(By the Press Correspondent.)
Over forty members were in attendance at our last week's meeting, and every officer was in place except one, who was called away by the death of a relative. This is a good record to keep up. Let's try it.

Memorial services in the Baptist church this coming Sunday at seven o'clock. It is requested that we meet at our own hall, and march to the church with the G. A. R. Be at the hall promptly at 6:30.

The "experience social" at the close of the meeting May 13 was a great success, both financially and entertainingly. Many of the "stunts" by which the ladies earned their contributions to the silver fund were well worth re-telling, in print, but as even the kindness of the Record does not allow us several columns of space, they must remain unprinted. Any way we must have gained a few ounces of avoidance if laughing will produce that result. At least $15 possibly more was realized for the silver fund.

EXCEEDED SPEED LIMIT.

Ray Baker was fined $5 and costs by Judge Noble last week for exceeding the village speed limit with his auto. This week E. Van Atta was surprised to think his auto had slipped up main street faster than 15 miles per hour on Sunday last, and he was assessed the same sort of fine. E. I. says it was worth the price to know he had a car to go that fast as it had been asserted time and again that he couldn't run his auto at a greater speed than six miles per hour. Mr. Van Atta is one of the careful drivers in town and it was so unusual an act on his part that this was probably what made it particularly noticeable. A lot of others who are and have been constantly tearing around in the most reckless manner, are as yet unmolested, but Mr. Bogart says the "speeders" are being watched and that they will eventually be caught "with the goods"

The Mysterious Monogram

An Absorbing New Novel

By Howard P. Rocky

Copyrighted by the Author

SYNOPSIS OF PREVIOUS CHAPTERS.

The morning after a dinner given at his club by Lord Harcourt, an English nobleman, to announce his engagement to Miss Grace Marston, one of his guests, Townshend, who was sitting at a table in one of the card rooms, later the old door man is found back of the club strangled to death. The only strangers at the dinner were Kandwehr, an Indian prince, and Cornish, an American.

Harcourt, having been intoxicated, remembered nothing of what he did after dinner, and his valet, having found a stiletto in his pocket and blood on his clothes, is afraid he might be guilty of the murder.

On the stiletto is carved a strange monogram, which Harcourt finds later on a cigarette stub on the table by the dead man and another in the Marston's drawing room and still another in a flower box near Miss Marston at the Cornish reception.

(Now go on with the story.)

CHAPTER VII.

AN INTERRUPTED VISIT

Fergus was in the hallway when Harcourt entered his house. "Anything for me?" he asked, giving the man his hat and cloak.

"Nothing my lord."

"Very well, then, Fergus. Go to bed. I shall not need you. My baggage is packed. I suppose?"

"Yes, my lord."

"We leave at eleven from Victoria station," Harcourt said.

He walked slowly up the stairs and back to his study. He knew there would be no help for him and he wanted to think alone to arrive, if possible, at some conclusion that would define for him his future course of action.

On the threshold of the room he paused, and then opened the half closed door. There was a faint glow by the fire, but no one sitting there.

Harcourt had had that he heard a noise in the far corner of the room. The light he had seen faded away quickly and as he listened all was still. Without a word he touched the electric switch, and as the glow appeared the room he gave an exclamation of surprise.

Bending over the filing cabinet was the figure of a man in evening dress. The man's face was faintly turned toward Harcourt and he saw that it was Harcourt and he gave a start of surprise. It was Kandwehr, who had been forced open, and the prince held in his hand the knife Harcourt had locked up in it.

Quietly Harcourt closed the door behind him and stepped back toward.

"Good evening, your highness," he said with mock courtesy.

"Good evening, my lord," he returned, still with a smile.

"You say my presence disturbs you?" Harcourt observed. "May I ask how you reached this room?"

With a wave of his hand, Kandwehr indicated the open window.

"Indeed," said Harcourt. "This is the second time I have had occasion to note that method of entrance—or exit."

Kandwehr smiled again, and it was evident that Harcourt's reference was not unknown to him. "You are most observing," he replied in his soft, purring voice.

"Had I known that toy was yours," Harcourt continued with a glance at the knife Kandwehr held, "I should—"

"Doubtless have mentioned the fact to the police," Kandwehr interrupted. "Believe me, my lord, but for the chance discovery of its sheath this afternoon, I should have been delighted to leave it in your possession—especially since you seem to place so high a value upon it." He indicated the open drawer of the filing cabinet.

"Really quite an ingenious hiding place," Harcourt said. "It took me some time to discover it after I succeeded in opening the drawer."

"You are well versed in such work?" Harcourt said sarcastically.

"I have the knife."

"Which you will be so good as to place upon the table," said Harcourt.

"Pardon me," Kandwehr objected. "I shall do nothing of the sort."

"Am I to be put to the unpleasant necessity of ringing for servants or perhaps telephoning to Scotland Yard?"

"You will do neither," said Kandwehr. "See here, Harcourt, let's get down to business. It is quite evident that you believe I am the murderer of Captain Townshend."

"I suppose such a supposition might be pardoned?"

"Between ourselves—possibly," Kandwehr admitted.

Harcourt crossed quickly to the table and pulled open a drawer in which lay a revolver.

"You won't need that," said Kandwehr calmly as Harcourt drew it out.

"If I had wished to kill you I have already had ample opportunity. I have no such desire, however, if you had shown any disposition to be sensible we might have discussed this affair sanely—man to man. But you are in no mood to listen to reason. Therefore I shall not intrude longer. I am going now—out by the window, but by your front door, and you will see me out as you might any other caller."

"Do you suppose for a moment," Harcourt began, "that I shall permit—"

"My dear sir, permit is not the word. I do not suppose anything. I am fully aware that you might turn me over to the police if you wished to do so, charging me with housebreaking and burglary. I do not believe you care to make such charges, however, since it would necessarily follow that the police would discover what I came to secure. Their knowledge of the fact that this knife was in your possession—unmentioned in spite of their questioning—had carefully locked away against possible discovery would hardly tend to strengthen your position just now."

"How about your own?" Harcourt suggested.

"I think my act would bear inspection," Kandwehr answered. "If you had killed Captain Townshend with a knife belonging to me—I state a purely hypothetical case now—could it not be natural for me to wish that knife out of the way of being found? I might be implicated in the crime?"

"Quite natural—If such were the case."

Kandwehr leaned forward him across the table, his face all at once came to Harcourt. "I said to you, I tell you I did not kill Townshend, and I do not know who did. I have my suspicions, but they are all I have. I am sure that a very old and valuable one that has been in my family for many years. Look at this!" He held the blade in his hand, and it gleamed brightly. "I told you I did not kill Townshend, and I do not know who did. I have my suspicions, but they are all I have. "To a great extent, yes. The police will never be able to fasten the crime upon you. Without the knife they cannot produce evidence against me. Your dagger, therefore, is a source of danger to both of us, for its discovery will implicate you as well as me. In that event I might be obliged, for self protection, to tell where I found it."

"Would you also mention just now at came into my possession?" Harcourt asked with a smile.

"Not being a seer—even though I am an Indian—I should be unable to throw any light upon that subject," said Kandwehr. "I can only add that I do not intend to be accused of this crime myself, for, whether you believe me or not, I am innocent of it."

"Kandwehr," said Harcourt, "you know far more about this than you are willing to tell. You seem overconfident of my safety, as well as of your own. Does your determination to remain silent go so far that you would let an innocent man pay the penalty for a crime he did not commit?"

The Indian did not answer at once. Then he spoke in a low tone, as though he feared that someone other than Harcourt might catch his words. "When I see an innocent man in danger I shall tell what I know," he said solemnly. "Until then my lips are sealed."

He stood by the door now, waiting. "Will you see me out as I suggest?"

For a moment Harcourt hesitated. What part had this man played in the events of the past twenty-four hours—what did he know of the mysterious monogram that had haunted Harcourt ever since his first discovery of the knife the Indian had come to steal. He knew that Kandwehr could tell him what he wished to know—if he would. But he realized that any questioning would be in vain and his own position in the matter forbade his trying to force the information he sought.

"It will probably be better that my servants should not know of your having been here," Harcourt said. "I will go down with you myself."

Kandwehr bowed and walked out. Silently Harcourt followed him down the stairs and himself let him out at the main entrance of the house. Without even a word of farewell, the great door closed behind the Indian, and Harcourt, more puzzled than ever, returned to his study.

CHAPTER VIII.

A SUSPECT ARRESTED

Alone on the steps outside, Kandwehr waited while he heard Harcourt set the chain within. The trees in the park shaded the house from the glare of the sun light at the corner, and he stood in the photographing darkness for a moment, looking eagerly up and down the now deserted street.

Then he slipped quickly down the steps and hurried off at a rapid pace. Once he looked back and saw no one, but when he had passed along a little way, a figure emerged from the shadows of a doorway opposite and followed slowly, halting now and then behind concealing shelters. Just Kandwehr should turn again and observe him.

Kandwehr, hastening his footsteps now, quickly turned the corner, and the man who followed hurried after him. The fog was growing thicker, and the chance of discovery growing less and less, the pursuer came closer in the rear that Kandwehr might elude him in the gray mist.

There were but few persons abroad, and those who passed glanced suspiciously at the figure in evening clothes, with his innumerable wrapped tightly about him, hurrying silently along through the haze. Now the jungle of a hansom bell came faintly to Kandwehr's ears, and once the horn of a taxicab warned him just in time to avoid the thing that suddenly loomed up out of the fog at a street crossing.

Still the man behind him—now only a few paces away—was still upon him, never risking for a moment any chance of losing sight of the Indian. But he made no effort to overtake him, his object apparently being to discover Kandwehr's destination.

At last Kandwehr came to the river and walked briskly along the embankment. The toll of a bell rang out loudly through the stillness, and he paused to look over the river wall. It was black and still below, and he smiled as he thought of being enveloped in the water's depths.

For a moment he stood leaning against the masonry. Then he drew the dagger from the folds of his cloak and looked at it for a moment. His arm shot up and the long, slender blade flashed wickedly in the faint light of a nearby lamp. With a smile, Kandwehr drew back his arm to throw it out over the dark, dirty water as it flowed quickly by.

As he did so a muttered sentence in a strange language escaped him, but before he could hurl away the knife a strong hand gripped his arm. With a swift twist, his wrist was turned back, and the blade dropped from his fingers, clattering upon the stone pavement at his feet.

With a snarl he turned his head, and looked into the determined eyes of a thick set man in a plaid mackintosh, a man of unusual strength whose grip still held him a prisoner.

"Not so fast, your highness," said the man with a grin. "I think MacBee will like to have that knife."

"Who are you?" Kandwehr demanded, his gaze turning from the weapon on the pavement to the face of the stranger.

"Barney is the name," the man replied. "And Scotland Yard the address. I think you'd better be coming there with me now, sir."

"You mean that I am under arrest?"

"I'm afraid so, sir. It you'll just step along a short distance I think I can find a night hawk with a cab, sir."

Still holding fast to Kandwehr's wrist, Barney stooped down and picked up the dagger.

"You needn't break my wrist bones," said Kandwehr with a grimace. "I shan't attempt to run away."

"Thank you, sir," said the detective. "I hope we won't have to detain you long, sir."

"I hope not, I am sure," Kandwehr agreed. "And may I ask why I am being taken there at all?"

"You may, sir, but I won't promise to answer. I happened to see you leaving Lord Harcourt's house, sir, and curiosity to know what you were going to do overcame me. When I saw you about to throw this beautiful little toy into the Thames, I just couldn't resist the temptation to ask you to come along with me and explain it all to MacBee. I knew he'd be interested in knowing why you didn't want it any more."

Barney smiled knowingly, and hailed a passing cabman who flapped up sharply when he heard the directions and caught sight of the detective's familiar countenance.

During the ride Kandwehr discreetly remained silent, and the detective was not disposed to be communicative. Half way to their destination—Kandwehr produced his cigarette case, apologized for having but one cigarette, and lit it after several attempts in the stiff breeze that was now blowing.

He only took a few puffs of it, however, and then threw it out of the cab with a sigh of relief. He had remembered just in time that the monogram of his cigarettes, and that on the hilt of the dagger in Barney's pocket were the same.

MacBee was in his office when they arrived. Fully dressed he sat by a small table with a reading lamp, smoking his pipe with evident enjoyment, as he sat staring silently at the ceiling.

He looked toward the door as the two men entered and smiled when he saw Kandwehr. Then he turned, at inquiring glance at Barney.

"He has the dagger, sir," said Barney, saluting his superior. "I found it in about to throw it into the river."

MacBee took the knife from the detective and examined it carefully. From his pocket he took the sheath that had been found in Dobson's trap, and fitted the long blade into it. With a smile of satisfaction he compared the workman-like on the hilt and blade with that of the leather case, and then, with a low whistle, looked straight at Kandwehr. "This is your knife," he said again.

"It is," was the frank and rather surprising reply.

"I thought so from the first," MacBee said. "The initials formed familiarly."

"They are mine," Kandwehr said without hesitation. "I gave the knife to Captain Townshend before Lord Harcourt's dinner last evening."

"Indeed?" said MacBee. "Did any one else see you give it to him?"

"No one with me."

MacBee looked at his closely for a moment, but the Indian never moved a muscle under his scrutiny. Then MacBee turned to Barney. "I thought you were watching Lord Harcourt's house," he said.

"I was. Prince Kandwehr left there shortly after 1 o'clock, and walked straight to the embankment."

With a look of surprise MacBee swung abruptly around and faced Kandwehr. "What were you doing in Grosvenor Square?" he asked sharply.

"Talking with Lord Harcourt," Kandwehr answered simply.

"I beg pardon, sir," Barney interrupted, "but I watched the house since midnight and I did not see the prince go out. Lord Harcourt returned in his car about 11 o'clock—alone."

"What time did you arrive there?" MacBee asked Kandwehr.

"Some time before I waited for Lord Harcourt to return."

"But you were at Mr. Cornish's reception. Did you not see Lord Harcourt there?"

"No. I left before he arrived."

"I am quite aware of that—or of the fact that you left shortly after he arrived," said MacBee slowly. "At 1 o'clock I received a telephone call from one of my men saying that you had just entered Lord Harcourt's house by the window of his study overlooking the park. He is still waiting for you to come out. It might have been interesting if he had gone in after you, but I thought it best not to have him do so."

With a smile, the inspector paused to light his pipe, looking curiously across the bowl at Kandwehr, while the match flickered over the fragrant tobacco.

"I trust your man will not weary from waiting," Kandwehr said with a grin. "Your theatricals are quite interesting, Mr. MacBee. It quite reminds me of a crime play. As it happens, however, you overstepped the mark this time. Lord Harcourt himself showed me out by the front door at about the hour this gentleman mentioned."

"Indeed," said MacBee. "But, may I ask why you use this peculiar mode of entrance to his lordships' residence?"

"Perhaps he would care to explain to you himself," Kandwehr suggested. "MacBee did not answer. For a few moments he puffed great clouds of smoke into the air and then put down his pipe. "You may go, Barney," he said and the detective left the room. "Now, Prince Kandwehr," MacBee resumed. "I am going to be frank with you. This is, beyond question, the knife that caused the death of Capt. Townshend. You have admitted that it is yours—or that it was yours—shall we say?"

"You must realize the position in which this places you. I am ready to listen to anything you may have to say but I warn you that any statements you make will be used against you."

MacBee took the chair the inspector indicated, and calmly returned MacBee's steady gaze.

"As I told you I gave this dagger to Captain Townshend before going to the Grill Club," Kandwehr repeated coolly. "When its sheath was found today I was naturally somewhat upset, least its discovery bring me unpleasantly into the affair. I had reason to believe that Lord Harcourt had the knife, and I went to his house this evening to satisfy myself of that fact."

"What reason had you for thinking that Lord Harcourt might have it?"

"It was not found with its sheath, and Harcourt was the last man seen with the murdered man."

"And when Lord Harcourt returned this evening, you asked him for it?"

"I did not."

"And yet you have it?"

"It was locked in the drawer of his filing cabinet which I forced."

"Quite remarkable," said MacBee. "Apparently, in your opinion, Lord Harcourt is the murderer, and in your anxiety least the discovery of your knife in his possession should point the finger of suspicion at you, you went to his house to recover it?"

"Exactly."

"Would not the finding of the knife in Lord Harcourt's house require some explanation on his part?"

"Doubtless. If it were discovered. But I preferred that the weapon be placed beyond all possibility of discovery."

"Surely your highness does not consider me a child?" said MacBee. "Kandwehr, you went to Lord Harcourt's house to leave that dagger there, in order that its ultimate discovery by my men might be used as evidence against him."

"Your powers of reasoning overpower me, Mr. Inspector," Kandwehr said in mock admiration.

"Do they?" said MacBee. "Look here, Kandwehr, I am perfectly aware of the fact that there is a great deal more to this business than we have as yet discussed. I know that you left the Grill Club last evening before the murder was committed, but unfortunately I do not know where you went when you did leave there, nor do I know that you did not return."

"But for his fortunate accident, the doorman might have been able to enlighten you," Kandwehr said smiling. "As it is, the other servants should have known of it if I had returned to the club."

"Unless you returned by means of the window," MacBee observed. "The murderer whoever he was, undoubtedly entered and left by that way. Within a few hours I shall have some interesting intelligence from Mr. Adam Broomfield, permit me to say that I have been in touch with myself and I have never had the pleasure of hearing of Prince Kandwehr before this affair came to my attention."

The Indian shrugged his shoulders, dismissing the statement as one of little interest or importance.

"Furthermore," MacBee went on, "I shall be obliged to detain you here for an indefinite period—in spite of the annoyance the fact may cause you."

"You mean that I am charged with this murder?"

"I mean that you will be detained here."

"And you do not intend to arrest, or at least examine, Harcourt to learn whether or not what I have told you is true?"

"If you will pardon me, I have not said what I mean to do or not to do. If you have nothing more to say concerning yourself, I shall bid you good night." And he touched the bell at his elbow.

A man in uniform entered. "Show Prince Kandwehr to his quarters," MacBee ordered and without further words, began refilling his pipe.

CHAPTER IX.

THE CONFESSION.

It was nearly dusk the next afternoon when Harcourt's car brought Sir Harry Farndale and Carrington over from the station to Harcourt Manor. The other guests had arrived before-hand, and Grace and Adele Cornish were preparing tea when the late comers walked

DOG NURSED PIGS AS PUPS

Firemen's Pet Canine Fosters Porkers in Lieu of Her Own Babies.

Pittsburgh, Pa.—Nellie, the Boston bulldog, at No. 51 engine house, Troy Hill, is not only mourning the loss of her litter of pups, but a pair of suckling pigs she had adopted. Nellie has the maternal instinct strong within her breast, and when her puppies were taken from her and scattered far and wide she would not be comforted. Captain William Higgins, of the engine company, visited the stockyards at Harris Island, where he was presented with a pair of wee motherless pigs.

Captain Higgins took the pigs to the engine house, fixed them a bed and tied himself to a drug store for a couple of nursing bottles. These he had filled with warm malted milk. But when he got back to the engine house he found no use there for his nursing bottles. Nellie, meanwhile, had found the orphan piglets. When they were taken from her and sent to a Reserve Township farmer she showed as much concern and grief as she had when her own babies were taken.

CAVE OF OUTLAWS

Many Ghost Yarns Cling to an Old Bandit Rendezvous.

Altus, Ok.—Owing to the fact that the celebrated and notorious James brothers made a rendezvous of a famous cave near Altus, it is called the Jesse James Cave by the people of the surrounding country. That they did make a hiding place of it is evident by the names carved in the soft stone. "Frank James, May 1, 1870," being foremost among them.

The entrance to the cave is about ten feet wide and eight or nine feet high, solid rock bottom and top, but to the right, as you enter, about ten feet from the entrance is strong evidence of man's work, there being a large excavation which will admit a man by bending over. This extends back about sixteen feet and is without doubt a place used for watch. Right in front of this excavation a large rock was placed and it was only by chance it was discovered.

The cave proper is about a mile long and at all times of the year filled with water. One can go back one-fourth of a mile and there the water is about three or four feet deep, but back further it is six to eight feet deep. The only access to the cave except by swimming is the front. This entrance is hard to find, a party driving along will not notice it. A deep ravine or gorge leads up to it, and it is impossible to descend this except right near the mouth of the cave.

A story is told of how a party going to visit the place drove on top of the cave right over the main entrance, got out and hunted for miles around for the place. When he came back to the house, they and his wife, and the owner and was shown that the horse and buggy were not fifteen feet from it.

The cave is located eleven miles west and five miles north of Brinkman. Ok. Indian relics scattered all around show others beside Jesse James had been there. In fifteen minutes three men who were hunting Indian relics found twenty Indian arrows, three of which were perfect.

Moss agates were picked up. A large stone which was made by the Indians to grind corn was another find. The owner is farming over the place made famous by these outlaws and is tilling the soil for his living, while by a few dollars expended this could be made a great resort.

The day of that visit was warm, so warm that there was no comfort, anywhere—104 degrees, in Oklahoma means warm weather—but in the cave the men were forced to put on coats to be comfortable. The water was cold and delicious though gyp water. Large flat stones enabled them to eat dinner as if from a table.

This cave has never been fully explored by the people near Brinkman. Some boys from Mangum went one day to find out something in regard to it. Three days later their parents went with lanterns to find the boys and brought them home on stretchers, two of them being unconscious when found. The boys had tramped around and around until exhausted in a chamber of the cave proper, of which there are many. They had lost their matches, their lanterns had gone out, and as it is inky dark in there they could not find their way out.

About twenty rods from the cave, as found a most beautiful spring. For ten feet the water gurgles and then falls over a precipice. Three feet from the place where it falls it is gone.

During the summer an ex-convict came to the owner of the cave and asked that he be allowed to explore it, he having been given a plan of the cave by a convict who died in prison. The plan marked where a large amount of money had been buried by some of the relatives of the convict that died. He was allowed to hunt, but did not find the money.

PET DOG STOPS RAM'S ATTACK

Saves Master's Life and Then Goes For Help.

Hazelhurst, Miss.—When Huyler Naboth, 71 years old, was attacked by a ram and seriously injured, his dog not only drove the animal away but also ran to neighbors a mile away and attracted so much attention that they followed him to his master. The ram has killed several dogs larger than Naboth's rescuer.

BASE BALL DOPE

In Ray Keating the Yankees think they have a star, who will in time be as good as Ed Walsh. Keating uses the spitball almost exclusively, but he seems to have the physique to stand it; he is only 21 years old and weighs 200 pounds.

Last spring he seemed the only pitcher that could win for New York. Later in the season he developed a lame arm and he was used very little.

Falkenberg has hopped to the Federal and leaves the Naps without any experienced right handers except Bill Green.

Fred was a real come-backer last season and his loss promises to be felt. He said that his terms were not met by the Cleveland Club, and so went where he could get what he was worth.

Meldon Wolfgang, or "Wolfie" for short, gets his fourth chance in big league company this year. He has played short engagements with the Boston Nationals, St. Louis Americans, and once before with the Chicago White Sox, where he tries it again this year.

Last season he ranked best among the pitchers of the Denver Western League team, who copped the rag in their circuit.

THE BARBER'S CUE

By BURKE JENKINS

Copyright, The Frank A. Munsey Company

"Next!" I cried, pocketing the tip, and indicating with customary deference the now vacant chair.

The heavily bearded man whose turn had at last arrived indifferently tossed aside the color-daubed weekly he had been lightly perusing, took of his coat, hung it up, and advanced toward me, tugging at a refractory collar button.

"Beard trimmed?" I queried in that engaging tone that comes so glibly to the lips of the artist tonsorial.

"No," he answered laconically. "Close shave and a hair-cut."

It was Saturday night and my usual rush of pre-Sunday slicking-ups was on. This bearded fellow had entered a full forty minutes before, and had complacently set himself at the end of a lengthy line.

Though busy, I had noticed him particularly, during those little passes of mine for steaming towels and irrelevant talk. And although his attitude was one of even exaggerated indifference, I could see that not a move I made was lost upon him, but he never met my eye.

Of course, my interest mounted accordingly, especially as he waved his right of turn to a later comer and thus insured his being last in line.

I kept open until eleven on these Saturday nights, but my assistant had pleaded a best girl birthday, so I had let him go this time and was correspondingly overworked.

Accordingly it was with a feeling of relief that I started to work on my last customer of the night.

The man's hair was of fine texture with a tendency toward baldness, and, as I clipped away, I remembered running over vaguely in my mind the various theories as to the cause of this phenomenon, for I too had begun to brush my hair anxiously over a parting patch.

Half-cut completed, I raised a general outcry and started at the heavy growth on his face.

Only from time to time whenever a slight change of position was necessary, would he be roused from his droopiness, but always relapsed again into slumber.

I stopped a razor, one with a strong edge and went to work.

Little by little the man's features began to reveal themselves. There was a marked strength to them coupled with an indefinable something which was rather felt than seen. But it was only when I was putting on the finishing pat of the dampened towel that I first caught his eye, and even then his glance was not direct. His gaze and mine met in the mirror before us.

Then, little by little, there came over me that fast strengthening realization. Now I could see why he had eluded me. I seemed to see this man before me shadowed from a dim past. How could I have been so slow in recognizing in him the leading factor in those difficulties that had brought me to my humble vocation? I who had so brilliant an outlook in the scientific world.

My usual passive nature rolled from me, I felt the heat surge over me with a quickening blood.

Little I had to lose; and surely here and now was my opportunity. I must at least lose none of the opportunities of this hour.

My man lay head back and throat exposed.

I stepped noiselessly toward my windows and pulled down the shades; then turned the key and pocketed it.

It was 11:30 and I noticed a slight rain had beaded the glass.

The man had dropped asleep again.

It was not a razor that I began to sharpen on the strap now. It was a shape of steel that suited me better. I thumbed the point and edge, it responded keenly.

There is a little spot anatomically situated which our friends of the Pyrenees know well. I had studied the locality. Accurately entered at that spot, four inches of steel does the trick nicely.

I was not nervous. That period had passed. But I seemed to be living the life of another man. A vagueness of surroundings coupled itself with a sharp realization of my real significance as a principal in this little scene about to be enacted. I knew my part. I was playing it well, and I remember experiencing a regret that such acting should pass without appreciative audience.

I dwelt upon the situation with all the zest of the morbid sentimentalist. But finally I raised the blade and advanced nearer the sleeper.

Have you ever lain in bed of a morning and experienced indecision as to whether to rise just at that moment or not? That was my feeling of vacillation as I gazed intently over my intended victim. And so I hesitated. He was mine and I dandied his life. Finally I leaned closer over him, then lowered my arm.

He opened his eyes sharply and gave a light laugh.

"I did not think you had the nerve to do it," he said evenly, and, although there was nothing in the words to merit it, he used an authoritative tone.

I recoiled a step in surprise and passed my left hand over my eyes to clear a seeming cloud.

"Perhaps this will compensate any inconvenience I may have caused you," he continued, still smiling. He produced a twenty-dollar bill.

"I don't understand at all," I stammered finally.

"Very simple," he explained, "and the experiment has been very satisfactory. I have cleared up two doubtful points. First, suggestion can be communicated by reflection in a mirror; second, the hypnotist cannot force his subject to perform a criminal act which is foreign to his own nature."

"Do you mean to tell me," I said, "that you have put yourself in such danger merely to find out? I assure you that I was about to end you."

"Well, you see," he replied, "it was certainly better to put myself in peril than somebody else's. But, anyway, as you'll see, your weapon isn't as sharp as you imagined it a moment ago."

I looked at my right hand. I was still firmly clutching a lather-bedecked shaving brush.

"All satisfactory?" queried my customer, raising and donning his togs.

"Quite so," I answered as I pocketed the twenty, but I was a long time getting to sleep that night.

New York.—Alphonse J. Stephani, a life convict in Dannemore State Hospital, incarcerated twenty years ago for killing a man, has an estate valued at $105,673. This fact has been made known by a report filed in the Supreme Court.

He now has $768 on hand and is said to "worry a good deal about the money." His committee recommends that no more be placed on deposit at the prison to his account until his present fund is reduced.

Skimmed milk which can be had at any minute in a house, will clean kid gloves much better than gasoline. Stretch the glove out on a clean cloth and take a clean white rag, wring it out in the milk and proceed to rub the dirt spots. Frequently wring out in the milk and renew if it gets too soiled. Wipe with a dry cloth when done and when almost dry stretch the fingers out across the hand.
