LITTLE GIRL STRUCK BY STREET CAR LAST SUNDAY.

Angeline, the nine year old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Chas. Sowles is in a serious condition at their home on east Main street. The child, running down the hill in front of Kohler's store Sunday afternoon, crossed the road in the path of a street car headed for Plymouth. She failed to notice its approach and was thrown across the road. The motorman, not able to stop his car had the presence of mind to lower the fender so that she should not be crushed. Will Lansing happening along in his machine carried the little girl home and Dr. Malloy was called. He found her right leg broken and her body covered with bruises. Severe hemorrhages resulted from the injuries on her head and it is feared that spinal meningitis may set in.

Both parents were out of town at the time. Mrs. Sowles having gone to Lansing for a vacation visit and the father at the home of his daughter in Birmingham. The shock needless to say was very great to both when they were informed of the accident. The little girl was somewhat easier Thursday.

BAPTIST LADIES' BENEFIT TO BE REPEATED.

The Jarvis concert given under the auspices of the Baptist Ladies Aid society in the Alsemum Wednesday evening was excellent. Mr. Jarvis and Miss Elsa Zeigler, reader, being noted artists in their respective lines.

The heavy rainstorm kept many at home who would otherwise have been present. For this reason the ladies have secured the services of Mr. Jarvis and Miss Zeigler for a later date, to be announced in this paper.

The program will be an entirely different one from that given this week. All tickets purchased for Wednesday evening and not used, will be good for the coming concert.

The piano used was a Bush and Gertz instrument and was loaned the ladies by Mrs. Wolfe and son, of Farmington.

With Roumania now a principal in the great European conflict, the whole country is aroused to the highest pitch. The accompanying pictures show the work of mobilization. One on top shows Roumanian troops forming a cordon in the streets of Bucharest, and the lower picture shows Roumanian infantry leaving its garrison town, preceded by its band, headed toward the frontier.

PERSONAL TALKS ON STATE ROADS

By Clinton Cowan.

possibly no one achievement of man marks the degree of civilization a community has reached as does a well planned and constructed system of roads. Civilizations, both ancient and modern, that have lost sight of or measurably depredated the construction and maintenance of a system of roads have held a short duration or have lapsed into semi-civilization communities. Road building and civilization seem to have gone hand in hand. Rome only weakened and finally collapsed after she had extended her dominion beyond the limits of easy and quick communication over her system of highways.

France, Germany and other European countries present striking examples of the advantage of carefully studied, well constructed and properly maintained systems of road. In the early stages of the present European war, the rapid mobilization of the armies of Germany, France and Austria was made possible only through the splendid condition of their roads.

While this has been of paramount importance to the countries now at war, we are hopeful in America that no such condition will arise where it may become necessary to use our highway for military purposes. Our aim and purpose in constructing roads is primarily in the interest of society, comfort and ultimate economy. The impulse or demand for road construction is one that has periodically sprung up and receded as we have from time to time changed or advanced in our methods of transportation and travel.

During the last decade agitation for better roads has reached the high point with the American people and seems paramount to all other subjects. The public clamor for good roads has reached a place where co-operation to this end is almost unanimous.

The more conservative citizen will say that he, too, is in favor of good roads, but demure at the expense, yet if the subject is carefully analyzed, it will be readily shown that the bad road is the more expensive, exacting its toll in the cost of hauling and transportation and carrying with it an obstruction that blights a community to every advantage and enjoyment that civilization otherwise affords.

LAUNCHING A NEW MOTOR CAR COMPANY

In other columns of this paper will be found the announcement of the Edward L. Dwight Co., Investment Bankers, Detroit, who will allow the public to purchase a limited amount of common stock of the Hackett Motor Car Co., Jackson, Mich.

The Hackett Co., with its complete organization and originally organized by Benjamin Briscoe, president of the Briscoe Motor Corporation.

The Hackett Co. is made up of capable honest business men whose ability in the automobile business has been proven by years of successful records. Their factory at Jackson, Michigan, is one of about 100,000 square feet and well equipped. They have facilities for turning out at least 5,000 cars which is the goal for the 1917 model. When the Hackett Co. was announced to the dealers there was an avalanche of orders sent to the Hackett Co. and it was with great care that the agencies were selected from the numerous inquiries.

They now have on hand advance orders which indicate that the demand is greater than the company's output.

The Hackett car will be in the class of the Hupmobile and other cars selling around the $1,500 mark, and to say that design is nothing but the opinion of leading engineers fully justifies slogan of the company, "A Different Car Distinctively Different."

They are at this time selling cars daily and having their employ about 125 men, and it is almost an assured fact that investors in this company will receive handsome dividends.

TIMELY TOPICS FOR ALL INTERESTED IN BETTER FARMING

Corn should be harvested as soon as in condition. It is best to millet, all go in grain and all, and not let it get overripe. If there are any of the millets not wanted to feed to the cows, these secured in good condition now will add to the variety of fodder crops for winter use.

The early potatoes should be dug and quickly stored in a cool, dark place, as the quality will then be better preserved. The later kinds may be left in the ground a little longer.

Soy rye, and timothy or red top, or both, on the pastures in the autumn, and they will be ready to furnish good grazing in the early spring and will improve the pasture for years to come. This method enables the farmer to get good pastures quickly. Early rye makes a good feed for production of milk.

The hub of the stage cutter is music on many a farm where it was never heard before. It sings a tune of prosperity, of safeguard against live stock loss, of insurance against high prices of feeds. The sly is the big preserving plant of the profitable

In Partnership with Uncle Sam

This Article was written especially for this paper by Chas. H. Allen.

A farmer of Northwestern Ohio who had just completed buying what he thought was enough land to thoroughly farm his land, said as he paid the tiler maker, "There is no title to land here."

The tile maker looked at him a minute, smiled, and said, "No, you have just begun."

The farmers of Northeastern Ohio and Southern Michigan are beginning to realize the truth of this remark. The title was held when the country was new seems now to be closer to the surface than when it was put in and this is the case.

At least seventy-five per cent of the land of Northwestern Ohio and Southern Michigan should be returned to obtain maximum crops.

We have plenty of length and breadth of land. What we need is more depth and that again depends upon the depth the tile is laid.

The tile maker and the tiler were the farmer's best friend and will be for many years to come.

Maximum crops for this rich soil mean 25 tons of sugar beets, to figure 100 bushels of corn, 90 to 100 bushels of oats and other crops in proportion. Such yields are being made this year on land that has this depth of soil in spite of a very adverse season.

To re-title this land means an expenditure of $25.00 to $35.00 an acre and many a farmer will hesitate about going into further debt although he knows it will pay him 200 per cent profits.

He can not borrow this money of the insurance companies for more than five years at a time and this is hardly long enough, besides there is a commission to pay every time he renewes and he is never certain he will be able to follow at any reasonable interest.

He has learned by experience just at the time the loan matures money is close, interest rates go up and he is compelled to pay a high rate for another five years. Well, he wonders if this is not a good time to make improvements that may take ten to twenty years to realize upon.

To help just such a situation and through the Farmer to help the entire country, the Congress of the United States has just passed an act that virtually says "Uncle Sam will go into partnership with you."

He will furnish the money and make the interest the very lowest that can be obtained, allow no taxes to be collected on the mortgage, create a banking system for the borrowers and stand on its own feet give it to the borrowers and pay them all the profits made by the bank. There are no commissions to pay, no renewals that he men who want to borrow to meet elect officers and notify the Federal Farm Loan Board at Washington, D. C.

These ten men may live in the same neighborhood, or the same township, or county, it matter not, so they are in touch with each other and with similar conditions.

After a district has been formed and a Farm Loan Bank established their business is all done through that bank and it will not be necessary to write to Washington.

Fifty per cent of the value of the land and twenty per cent of the value of the insured property may be borrowed and paid off in semi-annual or annual payments just as the borrower desires.

It was only a few years ago that it was almost impossible to obtain credit by giving a mortgage on real estate, land was so plenty and the demand for it was so little, it was the poorest security that could be offered.

Today things are different and "Dad Sag" is willing and anxious to offer further help make mortgage security on farm land in the United States equal to Government and Municipal Bonds.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

Comments By

Rev. Ernest Bonner Allen, D. D.
Pastor of the Washington Street Congregational Church and the Marion Lawrence Sunday School, Toledo, Ohio.

Lesson for October 1st.

Lesson Title: "A Plot That Failed."

Lesson Text: Acts 23. Memorize vs. 20, 21.

Golden Text: "They shall fight against thee; but they shall not prevail against thee; for I am with thee, saith Jehovah, to deliver thee." Jeremiah 1:19.

I. What Can a Boy Do?

Every boy has his hero. He may not acknowledge it and there are cases where he may not be fully aware of it. If some special opportunity arises, however, he will show his loyalty by an offer of service. It will not make any difference how dangerous the task may be, you will find the boy ready. Something like this occurred when Paul was in danger. His sister's son heard a group of men binding themselves under a curse not to eat anything until they had killed Paul. With soldierlike directness he at once told Paul, who called the centurion and took the boy to the chief captain. Thus the plot to kill the great leader of Christianity was foiled.

Now it seems to me that back of this boy's action was a great love for Paul. I wonder if we expect enough from boys. Of course there are cases where we doubtless expect too much. How much does your church expect from them? How much do you expect from the boy in your home? What other factors besides the boy constitute the "boy problem"? There is scarcely any church or community where some service may not be rendered to the boys by any man or woman bright enough and unselfish enough to desire to help them.

H. The Soldier's Business.

When the boy told the chief captain about the plot, soldiers were at once sent to protect Paul and bring him to the governor. Soldiers always played an important part in protecting life. They have also been used in enforcing the law. Some people believe that they should not be used in this way, because they interfere in case of strikes or lockouts. The attitude of the common people toward our national guardsmen is affected by this viewpoint.

Just now we are busily discussing how large an army we ought to have. We are setting in order the reasons for and against enforcing law and order in Mexico. These are important matters. They ought not to be made merely selfish or political capital. Our fellow citizens who are in the army on the border have a difficult task to perform. It requires experience, patience and unselfish service on the part of thousands of men. Policing the

BEAUTIES FROM U. S. AND CANADA SEEK FILM FAME IN GOTHAM

Eight winners of "beauty and brains" contest seeing New York.

Eleven beautiful and engaging girls—one representing Canada and the other ten chosen from nine states in the union—have arrived in New York to become picture stars. They are the winners of a big film company's "beauty and brains" contest and each is assured of a thorough screen trial. The prize beauties were shown about New York in a big touring car shortly after their arrival.

frontier is not pleasant but it may be a great national, as well as international, service.

III. On Keeping Your Mouth Shut.

When the soldiers were sent to protect Paul the chief captain charged the boy not to tell anybody. It is a great art to keep one's mouth shut. Talking may ruin a home. It may threaten a business firm. It may wreck great plans. There are notable circumstances under which men have failed simply because they talked too much. If less were said about domestic troubles by the neighbors, many a home would be better off. The average community deserves severe censure at this point: "Do you know when to talk and when not to talk?" In other words, can you show the grace of keeping your mouth shut?

IV. Protective Providences.

Paul believed that God exercised special protection over his life. The discovery of this plot is a case in point. Do you believe in protective providences? Why not? Have you seen illustrations of your own family, possibly in your own life? Why do we not emphasize the fact that there are modern applications of the golden text? "They shall fight against thee; but they shall not prevail against thee; for I am with thee, saith Jehovah, to deliver thee." It is good to feel that we have face dangers, soon and unseen, that God's protecting hand is over our lives and will be exerted in our favor. It does away with much of the anger and worry which destroy the peace and joy of life. The Christian has a right to sleep with calmness and confidence because God is indeed near.

Doubtless Paul felt that his life was spared and protected for some great purpose. Life becomes more precious when we realize that it has God's constant care. The uses to which we put the remaining years, however many may be left for any one of us, are a commentary on our appreciation of what God does for us. Let us be more kind to those around us, more sympathetic with those who sorrow, more unselfish in all the plays we make, more Christlike in all the relations of life.

HOW THEY GO SHOPPING DURING STRIKE

Since the beginning of the great traction strike in New York the autoped, the latest single passenger motor vehicle, has been more prominent in the streets of the city than ever before. The young woman seen in the picture did not permit the strike to stop her shopping tour, and she made her inspection of the store on her autoped. Many persons travel to work on them.

Household Hints— Recipes and Advice for Interest to Housewives.

THINGS WORTH KNOWING.

An old blackboard eraser is one of the best things to use for polishing the kitchen stove.

To keep cheese for some time and prevent it becoming mouldy or dry, wrap it in a cloth dampened with vinegar and keep it in a dish.

When baking elderberry pie, put in a pinch of salt and a few drops of vinegar. This will improve the taste.

To keep doughnuts moist when taking them from the hot lard dip as quickly as possible in and out of boiling water. They will be less greasy and keep moist a long time.

THE TABLE.

Peach Pudding.—Cover the bottom of a baking dish with stale cake crumbs cut not rolled. Spread over the peaches which have been chopped fine and sweetened with granulated sugar. Then add another layer of the stale cake crumbs and repeat the alternate layers until the dish is full with the last layer of cake. Bake until brown, about 20 to 30 minutes. Draw to the edge of the oven and stand over the top a marzipan made from the well-beaten whites of two eggs, two tablespoonsfuls of sugar and the juice of half a lemon. Cover a golden glow and serve hot with cream or cold sauce.

Rice Cream with Peaches.—This is a mouthful as well as a tasty dessert. The peaches soak a pint of rice over night in water and drain in the morning. Cook them, then add to a quart of milk, seasoned with half a teaspoonful of salt, a dash of pepper and a dash of nutmeg. Boil until it is done. Strain into the bowl. Add a teaspoonful of sugar. Allow the mixture to cool and add a teacup of cream, whipped stiff. Pour the whole into a mold. When ready to serve, turn out of the mold and encircle the creamed rice with peaches sliced and sugared, or you can stew the peaches with just enough water to make a rich syrup and serve these ice cold around the creamed rice.

Peach Melba.—For this popular dish select large firm peaches that are very ripe and cut off the stems. Pare them, cut them in half, and take out the stones. Separate them gently in enough water to cover them, add half a cupful of sugar to every quart of water. Add two or three cracked benzal stones to the water as they are cooking to give added flavor. When they are tender, boil them in circles from half-inch slices of sponge cake and when the peaches are cold, lay a pencil on each slice of cake with the hollow end by the stone upward. Fill the hollow with a big teaspoonful of vanilla ice cream.

Wide frills are still good on the blouse of crepe de chine.

Green and silver is a favorite color scheme for evening.

Opinions pro and con in regard to the great evangelist now performing—as many people call it—in Detroit, are nearly as various as the people who hear and see him. People are mad or sad or glad or contemptuous or approving just according to circumstances and temperaments. While pre-conceived opinions influence certain ones to an extent that prevents even a powerful personality like Mr. Sunday's from changing their views as to his manner and methods, others who are able to attain an attitude of open-mindedness have been profoundly impressed and have modified their views or even entirely changed them. There is no possible general classification of opinions. Clergymen of the highest type of culture are among Mr. Sunday's enthusiastic helpers and admirers, refined educated women listen with absorption to his startling expressions, while people of far lower mentality are shocked at what he says. Thousands admire and revere him unconditionally, hundreds go to his meetings to criticize or to satisfy curiosity. And yet—people go, and go constantly and in ever increasing numbers, as in all places where this twentieth century prophet with his old-century views can be heard. And at least, after all is said, there is no disputing Billy Sunday's power to turn men and women from evil ways. The records of his years of evangelistic work show many permanent results that no critic can controvert. We may not entirely approve of his methods but all honor to the good he has done and will do.

THE ELECTRIC LIGHT PLANT SALE.

Next Monday, Oct. 2, is the date set for the annual election to decide whether the village electric light plant shall be sold at price to the Edison Company.

If it is done now the Edison people have stated they will buy a lot and erect a suitable office building here and continue to maintain this as their division headquarters. The Company also calls attention to the fact that in the event of the sale they will then be obliged to pay taxes on their property here which in itself will be a considerable figure. While the village will be the loser for two years, so far as the difference in the interest proposition is concerned, this would appear to be more than offset by the new building, the permanent headquarters and payment of taxes. With this statement presented by the Manager here, Mr. Hotton, there is seemingly no opposition to the present proposal and it seems sure of carrying at this time.

The Edison people have been giving splendid service here the past two years and their rates seem to be very satisfactory. The Company's officials are very courteous and obliging and there is a general friendly feeling towards the Company.

GO TO CHURCH NEXT SUNDAY.

The Northville churches are to observe their third annual "Community Church Day" next Sunday with special morning services. This is one day in the year when it is hoped that practically every family in town may at least be represented at one or another of the churches. It certainly will not hurt any of our readers to attend religious services one Sunday in the year, even if it is not their regular habit, and surely all church members should make it a point to help their pastors in making the event a success, as heretofore.

It isn't any dancing "stunt" that keeps all the housewives stepping around so briskly nowadays, even though they can can.

Seems "funny" to a whole lot of folks—but not at all amusing to the victims—that whereas in former times horse-stealing was a capital crime in some places, nowadays a man who swipes a costly touring car is set off with a fine or (or and) brief imprisonment. Maybe if such law were made applicable to auto thieves it would tend to decrease the increasing practice.

And now along comes an Eskimo who was with Lieut. Peary and says that neither the latter nor Doctor Cook correctly discovered the north pole. As nobody except the geographers cares where the darned thing is anyway, let 'em fight it out if it takes a few centuries longer.

A Pontiac man named Uplegger was recently sentenced to 90 days in the H. of C. for carrying concealed weapons. No doubt he kept 'em up his trouser leg.

Detective Stories

These stories give the exploits of one of the craftiest and most daring criminals of French fiction. The stories are now appearing on the moving picture screen and have just been released.

FANTOMAS

These stories are along typical French lines, which portray the "crook" as he actually is, and not as a hero in any sense of the word.

FIRST PART

The Theft at the Royal Palace Hotel

All Paris was seething, with uneasiness, the victim of vague rumors. Suspicions were ripe. Norman failed to trust his neighbor. Every newspaper was eagerly scanned as soon as it appeared on the streets. A band of criminals was retrofiting the city.

The police acted vigorously, with those they caught. Some were sent to prison, and others were held resisting arrest. Because of this constant police pressure, after a time law and order seemed to be getting the upper hand in the city. Its inhabitants began to breathe easier. Suddenly there came a new and terrible menace:

FANTOMAS!

The very name spread intangible terror. Fantomas—a phantom, a being without material existence, yet with a deadly power! Many who had not felt the sinister and heavy hand of the unseen monster laughed at the fear which mention of the name inspired. Those who had been victims of his malice did not laugh. They spoke of Fantomas with dread and alarm.

First a murder was attributed to which was laid at the door of the mysterious personage. Other crimes, equally mystifying, were then alleged to have been committed by him. The basis for the supposition was that after each crime a white visiting card was found upon the scene. Upon warming it there would appear the one word:

FANTOMAS.

This mysterious creature, who seemed to have taken up each of implausible hatred towards society, remained undiscovered. No one seemed able to furnish a complete description of him. Some who claimed to have seen Fantomas described him quite differently from others who also had been his victims or had come upon him while at work.

The terror spread. It seemed to be without limit when the chief of police sought to allay the excitement by issuing a statement in which he declared Fantomas did not exist. He explained that in reality the authorities were confronted by an organized band, using the name Fantomas. He added that he hoped to arrest the members of the gang rapidly.

However, opinion remained divided. Some declared that no man could keep under his control such a well organized band as Fantomas was reported to command. Others even scoured the idea of such a gang, pointing out that sooner or later one of its members would have sold the secret of its existence, for immunity, pardon or gold.

Then there came a lull. For six weeks no card of the mysterious being found its way into the hands of the police. Talk of Fantomas had pretty well died down when the Princess Sonia Daniloff arrived in Paris.

The Princess spent six months of each year in the French capital. Upon her return each season there was always a great deal of fuss made in the newspapers over her arrival. After the American fashion, she dwelt in an apartment hotel, one of those luxuriant structures which are replacing the homes of even the wealthy. Her apartment was on the third floor, four large rooms which rivaled those reserved for royalty when visiting Paris incognito.

Society could itself in entertaining this beautiful woman. She was a dream of elegance even in the most exclusive circles. Related to royalty extremely rich, witty, vivacious, intellectual, with an unrivaled reputation. Princess Sonia was well able to fascinate Paris and hold its attention.

Fantomas chose the night the princess attended the first ball after her arrival for his next astounding adventure. Upon the morning of that day she had told the cashier that she wished to have the safe left open that evening, as she desired to take from it a packet she had deposited for safe keeping. This contained $25,000.

At one o'clock that night the princess returned, secured the money, and was taken to the third floor by the night elevator man. Her maid was waiting for her in her bedroom, a handsome room hung with heavy draperies at the windows. She put the precious bundle of bank notes on her desk, and then removed her priceless pearl necklace. After carefully throwing it down beside the money she started for her dressing room. Thinking better of it, she retraced her steps, and placed the money and the pearls in a drawer of the desk.

No sooner had she disappeared than a man parted the heavy curtains. Two nasty strides seemed to be all he took in crossing the room to the desk. He was apparently a gentleman of about forty years of age, faultlessly attired in evening dress. His square black beard and heavy mustache accented the nobleness of his face. His stiff fingers sparkled with a strange, hard brilliancy. They glanced from place to place in a manner highly disconcerting.

Just as he had partially opened the drawer containing a fortune in jewels and money, his purpose was foiled by a hoarse sound from the dressing room, which unmistakably betokened the return of the princess and her maid. At one bound, it seemed, he returned to his hiding place, sealing himself off again instant before the two women entered the room.

"Your Highness wishes further help?" inquired the man.

"No, thank you. You may go."

The maid withdrew. For a minute or two Princess Sonia sat lost in thought, flying over again the happy hours she had spent that evening. Suddenly her attention was attracted by the half-opened drawer. The sight of it was a distinct shock. Yet when she discovered that the money and the pearls were intact her equanimity was at once restored. Perhaps she had not closed the drawer after all, she thought.

"Not until Princess Sonia was ready to retire did she walk to the desk to look in the drawer. As her hand reached for the key, she heard a voice exclaim:

"Great heavens, Madam, how beautiful you are!"

Surprised and frightened, she wheeled instantly to confront a gentleman in the middle of the room. His only movement was a courtly bow. His eyes fascinated her. Nothing she did escaped them.

The princess was no coward. She came of a brave line, schooled in restraining emotion. As she crossed the room to an electric call button, she was outwardly calm. It was apparent that she sought aid in effecting the intruder from her apartment.

"Stand where you are." The voice of the man became imperative. Don't scream. If you do your life will pay the penalty for your disobedience. Come now accept conditions as you find them. It's far wiser to believe me. Sit down, I insist." There was again the imperitive tone. "Now we can talk. Don't be scared."

Schamed by his manner, Princess Sonia obeyed.

"What do you want?" she asked. "I don't know you. Why are you here?"

The unknown man seated himself, a mysterious smile playing about his lips. He had been careful to place his chair between the princess and the desk which concealed the treasure. It was a strategic position which gave him every advantage.

"You don't know me, and it is just as well you don't." He replied to her question with the cold imperturbability which had frightened the princess most of all when he had stopped her from ringing for help. "I know you, and that's enough. Why I am here is the only thing of importance at the present moment."

Stifling her dread of the man, the princess summoned sufficient firmness to reply:

"It is true that I don't know you. I don't know but what you are trying to play a joke on me. But I do know this. You belong here at this hour, is the sound, and all the guests of the hotel were awakened. The elevator sank to the ground floor.

In the office the alarm given by the princess through the night telephone operator had drawn the lobby of all the employees on duty at that hour except Louis, the night cashier. He was busy telephoning for help.

When the elevator reached the office floor, the elevator man sprang out and rushed to the test.

"Quick! The keys!" he gasped. "I'm going for the police."

Louis threw him the keys without noting down the receiver of the telephone. The man seized them, ran to the door, which was always kept locked after midnight, opened the door, locked it after him, and disappeared into the night.

All this had happened within three minutes after the bells had been set ringing.

The whole hotel was in an uproar. Hasty dressed people appeared in the halls; others peered from their doors, asking the reason for the clamor. Everyone was questioning everyone else, and getting no satisfactory answer.

"No one has gone out," was the manager's first question after Louis had told him what had happened.

No one. Wait a minute; the elevator man went out to summon the police.

The manager ran to the elevator, thinking to find some clue which would point to the elevator man himself as the author of the crime. Upon opening the door and looking within, he recoiled with a look of horror. Lying on the floor, seemingly dead, he had beheld a half-naked man. Not until he was taken out to be given medical attention did they discover that he was the elevator man himself. But medical aid was of no avail. The man was dead. Beside him on the floor of the elevator was found a dress suit, a false beard, and a pair of false mustaches. These he put in his pocket, and calmly turned to go.

Sonia Daniloff started to cry out, but a short, violent sweep of the man's hand struck terror to her heart.

"I beg your pardon, princess, but when I give an order, I expect to be obeyed." He already warned, you make no outcry. I'm going now. Walk with me to the door."

"You bend!"

"That goes without saying, but nevertheless you are going with me to the door." Come, princess. I'm waiting."

The unhappy Sonia well understood that the man was ready for anything. She felt certain that he would readily kill her to gain his liberty or preserve his life. Hence, she offered no resistance, but accompanied him to the door of the apartment.

The man, who did not like the idea of killing the beautiful woman, knew well what was passing in her mind. He knew that as soon as the door had closed, she would rush to the telephone and alarm the hotel. Then all the exits would be closed and watched. It was necessary for him to gain time.

When the door was opened, his decision had been reached. With a sudden, violent gesture the man hurried out.

Princess Sonia from him. She stepped outside the door, which he took the precaution to lock before departing.

As soon as Princess Sonia could rise to her feet, she rushed to the telephone and gave the alarm.

"Close all the doors," was her breathless request to the night telephone operator. "I've just been robbed by a man who was hidden in my room. Send some one to open my door. I've been locked in."

Not until she had telephoned did she think to look at the card the mysterious stranger had given her. On it now appeared the one word:

FANTOMAS.

Upon rushing to the elevator, Fantomas saw that it was ascending to his floor. The cage was empty except for the operator. The audacious thief rang the bell. When the door was opened, he sprang upon the man and not got along well with his wife, seized him by the throat. At that very instant the alarm bells began to ring. The corridors vibrated with Lady Beltham was leading a double life. There was the life of the nor know, but he felt sure that it was going to lead him somewhere in wealth and position, and then there was the other which she was hiding with jealous care. To console herself for the unhappiness her marriage had brought her, Lady Beltham in all hours of folly had listened to the whispered pleadings of an unknown man she had met at a ball at the home of a fashionable friend.

It was a man about forty, seemingly accustomed to the best society, correct in every move he made. Lady Beltham felt that he was a man of wealth, just as she could see that he was a man of refinement. His manner, his gestures and his outlook on life were those of a young man. It was not long before the woman capitulated to the charm which the distinguished man of mystery possessed.

Her passion for the stranger had been so skilfully concealed that no one was it going to lead him? He did hardly was Juve out of the house than Lady Beltham rushed to the mysterious guest, who was unacquainted with the incident of the hat. In a few words she told him what had happened. The news galvanized the man to instant action. His anger was intense, but he did not show it to delay the execution of the plan he had instantly formed.

Seating himself at the desk, the man wrote with feverish haste:

"Manager, South Steamer Co.,
Dear Sir: Please send immediately to my apartment, 47 Rue Levert, for three trunks. Ship them immediately to Johannesburg, where I will take charge of them. Ask the janitor for the keys of the apartment. GURN."

Wishing to learn more of Guru before the man returned from his visit to Lady Beltham, Juve took a taxi for the apartment in the Rue Levert. The janitor was not disposed to give him much information. Mr. Gurn visited the apartment but rarely. He traveled a great deal, and at that very time was absent from the city. Realizing that the woman was only telling what she had been coached to say, Juve showed his police badge and insisted upon having the apartment opened for him. The trembling woman did as he commanded.

The apartment seemed to be uninhabited. There were some large trunks, and Juve had just begun to look at them curiously when two baggage men arrived from the office of the South Steamer Company. They clutched his feet, and his eyes gleamed with a baleful light. Lady Beltham was unmistakably frightened to learn that Detective Juve was her captor. The men were inconsistent, and it was not until the janitor had rushed to the street and returned with a policeman that they ceased to dispute Juve's authority.

Dismissing the man, Juve ordered the policeman to break open the trunks. He expected to find valuable information regarding the mysterious visitor to Lady Beltham's villa. On opening one of the large bar trunks, the policeman started back in alarm. Inside the trunk was the body of a man. Upon examination it seemed as if the man, who had been strangled, had been dead several days.

Juve immediately began a careful search of the apartment. In a desk, which he pried open, he found only a package of plain white cards, nothing else. He knew the cards only too well. He had seen one just like them at the Royal Palace Hotel. Warning one in his hand, there soon appeared the one word:

FANTOMAS.

He had discovered a tremendously important fact. Guru and Fantomas, the murderer and the thief, were one and the same man.

Despite the fact that Juve had discovered Guru to be identical with Fantomas, it was several months before that information was of the least value to him. Yet all that time he closely watched the villa of Lady Beltham at Neuilly. Fandor was his constant companion. Neither grew discouraged as time passed, for both were certain that Fantomas was either there or else would be unable to stay away. With the patience of two great tigers of the jungle, they watched and waited.

At last just at nightfall the watchers were rewarded. In the gathering dusk a man was seen upon the terrace. A woman joined him and flung herself into his arms. Juve and Fandor immediately came to the conclusion that the mysterious man had been hiding in the villa, but was afraid to remain there longer. Now that he was about to seek another hiding place he was taking a long farewell of Lady Beltham. Beside Fandor, Juve had two policemen under his direction. Ordering the policemen and the journalist to wait at the gate through which it was plain the man planned to emerge, Juve himself crept along the wall to keep him in sight.

At last the mysterious guest of the villa tore himself from the embrace of the woman who besought him to remain. He walked down the steps of the terrace and looked about him before inserting the key in the door in the wall. Re-assured by the tranquility of the scene, he hesitated no longer. Unlocking and opening the door, he stepped outside.

With the spring of a deer, Juve leaped from the wall and seized the murderer by the throat. The man was not so easily overcome. He shook himself free, hurling the detective to the ground. However, he was no match for Fandor and the two policemen who now sprang upon him. He surrendered silently and was led away to prison.

"Do you live hereabouts?"
"No, I live in Edinburg, but I must catch the southern express here tonight."

"Must?"
"Must, because it is what I wish most to do. That is the only circumstance under which the word is allowable," and she smiled unconcernedly.

"I must also catch the Southern express here tonight," said he.

"Is it what you most desire?"

"What I most desire in the whole world," he said softly.

She threw him a pleased smile that immediately turned to ashes in her mouth. The remark had not included her at all. His eyes were turned away, searching the deepening shadows anxiously.

She walked away a few steps and stood tapping an angry foot on the platform.

If this new thing that had risen in her had not been so sweet she might have had space to regard it with awe. Of course, she could not know it was the instinct come to stay.

He followed her, but not nearly promptly enough, and she only gave him her shoulder. It was all very crude and primitive this, but the instinct was only a primal thing, so much of a stranger she had never had time to cultivate and subtelize it; but it seemed to gain her end, for though she didn't look, she knew he was gazing at her both with reproach and contriteness. It was just as she would have had it, and she sang softly to herself, turning still the irreverent shoulder upon him.

Then down the valley flashed a light, echoed a rattle that swelled into a roar, and the Southern express was upon them. The immobility of the adventure so excited her that the good by she threw him was hurried and cold enough to have been an open dismissal.

It was necessary to leave him; she had her part to play, and filled with the thought of that, the chance of its being a final farewell had no time to sober her. She was all intent, peerless into the dark for the handkerchief.

It passed, only a dim flash, barely seen between the dark and the dust, and when she hurried forward to the carriage it was gone. For a moment she stood in doubt, and then, hurried by an impression that the mass of hillside was at her shoulder, darted into the nearest door.

The compartment in which she found herself was empty. She hesitated before the mirror, not so much from vanity, for the straightening of mental rather than headgear.

For the first time the seriousness of the business struck her four murders and he would hardly hesitate at a fifth. It was slowly that she walked out into the aisle and opened the door of the next compartment.

The only occupant turned at her entrance, and at sight of him she shrank back with a gasp. He was low and eyes that looked at her were deep set in the bony face of an ape. Her first glance had conjured up a word that had ringing through her brain, and the word was "apathy."

The man lifted his hat with a grin that held bare double rows of broad yellow teeth, and as he rose she saw that his arms were disproportionately long, the hairy hands reaching to his knees.

She fled into the passage with a wail, swinging the door shut behind her, and then she ran down the passage and straight into the arms of the man of the hillside. For a moment she lay half sobbing on his breast, clutching him with all a child's unreasoning fear; then he led her into an empty compartment, his arm about her waist.

"I can't do it, I can't, I can't," she wailed.

"Then I wouldn't," he murmured soothingly.

This piece of masculine comfort made for laugh, and the laugh calmed her.

"O-ooh," she breathed, "what a weak woman I am."

Under his smiling eyes her own fell. The black night made a perfect mirror of the window pane, and in it she saw what stood behind them—the uplifted arm, the cruel apelike face.

There was no time to cry out. Quick came the thud of the fallen blow, and the strong man in her arms sank to the floor, almost dragging her after him. She was rudely brushed aside, and crouching against the wall looked on while a wonder silenced her.

The apelike man had slipped hand cuffs from his pockets, and in a moment had the other securely bound.

Then, with a surprising strength in one so small, he picked up the inert body, dropped it in the corner seat, and turned to Miss Mitford with outstretched hand.

"Congratulations," he smiled.

She took the hand, although she shuddered at the touch, and he, evidently noticing her reluctance, smiled again and fished out a card.

"Say—excuse me, but I guess this is the proper stunt over here."
