Lansing—What is going to happen to the waterfalls of the Upper Peninsula?

Here is a question that involves a controversial issue, and likely everything else you find many sides to it. It isn't all one-sided by a long shot.

The two Tahquamenon Falls in Luce county are now under state ownership, having been transferred by the federal government to the state conservation department in a swap of timber land.

But many other scenic waterfalls in the Upper Peninsula are owned privately, and two of these—Victoria and Bond falls in Ontonagon county—have been exploited for commercial purposes by private power interests.

Having just returned from a 1,200 mile trip into this fascinating country between Lake Superior and Lake Michigan, we have some hard impressions. You may be disturbed by them; we were.

National Defense

National defense is doing things to this northern region.

Strangely enough, while it has stimulated the greatest tourist season in many decades if not in all history, it is creating a new demand for commercial use of two natural resources—waterfalls and timber—which are conceded to be valuable tourist assets.

Iron and copper ore are imperatively needed for America's defense. Old mines are being re-opened while new mines are contemplated. Wisconsin industrial towns also need electric power.

To meet this existing and prospective demand, the Wisconsin Michigan Power Company, for example, recently completed building of a dam and reservoir on the Michigan river near Crystal Falls. It is called the new Way Dam. A new large lake has been created which will add to existing fishing grounds in Iron county.

Below this reservoir the power company is contemplating the building of a hydro-electric plant. A possible site for the dam and plant is the Michigan river in a narrow gorge through which was one of the Michigan river rapids.

Horsemen Rapidly

Total around the Michigan Falls has been acquired by the power company.

The state is also going to acquire the three Bond falls and other creeks on the Point St Ignace and one ten miles or more from Crystal Falls through a blueberry plant. A possible hydro-electric development is in the cutting for this location.

When a recent report read about the Victoria Falls on the Ontonagon river which was reported to be Michigan's largest waterfall.

The Michigan Power Company is a commercial hydro-electric plant in order to keep a steady flow of water to the Victoria Falls. The utility formerly an Insull subsidiary has diverted water from a branch of the Ontonagon river just above Bond falls.

A controversy ensued with the state conservation department which happened to own cereals below Bond falls and consequently had rapid rights. A gentlemen's agreement which has not been made into a legal contract, resulted whereby the power company is maintaining a sufficient flow of water over Bond falls to preserve its scenic appeal. Furthermore, the company has even "patched" the face of the falls with concrete, and not one tourist in ten thousand would ever notice it.

What Should Be Done? It is easy to express snap judgment and say that the power company is to blame.

Actually, if anyone is to be blamed it is probably the indifferent and selfish citizens who take little interest in esthetic affairs of this kind. If he can drive his automobile right to the falls and view it from the car, then he will enthuse," observed a state conservation official at Lansing. "But otherwise, it seems that the average man and woman doesn't care."

The fact remains that the waterfalls belong to private utilities simply because no one else has been interested enough to induce the state legislature to appropriate funds to acquire the waterfalls for perpetuity of all future citizens.

Is the conservation department to blame? We figure it out for yourself.

The department has 56 parks to maintain and administer. Its annual budget is $160,000 or just about $3,000 per park per year.

The department also administers the upkeep of some 4,500,000 acres of forest land in Michigan. Two million acres of this were acquired in the 1933 tax sale.

Obviously with $3,000 to spend on each of its 56 parks in Michigan, the conservation department is barely able to maintain the grounds and provide occasional improvements. Unlike other states, Michigan does not charge an admission fee into its public parks, and there
