If heats steel
WHITE HOT
 in less than two minutes—

... one of the thousands of jobs Electricity is doing to win the war

The electric induction furnace is an important tool in helping to speed up war production... and it is most unusual in its manner of operation. You can place your bare hand inside the furnace and not feel a bit of heat. But place a steel bar in the same spot, and in one or two minutes it becomes WHITE-HOT.

Induction heating has several clear-cut advantages. For example, it is useful in hardening the surface of a steel piece without affecting the toughness of the steel below the surface. Armor-piercing shells are point-hardened by this process. Engines and parts for airplanes, tanks, submarines, armored cars, etc. are made with the help of induction heating. A crankshaft whose surface has been hardened in this way will last five to ten times longer before needing attention than it would without such treatment.

Cun barrels of a certain caliber are now centrifugally cast from alloy-steel melted in an induction furnace. Stainless steels and "fussy" alloys are commonly melted in these furnaces, as are most of the high-speed and tool steel used for cutting. And bronze castings for naval torpedoes also come from the induction furnace.

Induction heating and melting represents only ONE of thousands of jobs that electricity is doing today in armaments and war plants. Electric power is a weapon of war.

Help Save 1,450 Hours
 each day on war-busy wires!

Six out of every ten calls to "Information" are for numbers that are listed in the Telephone Directory. Those needless calls increase the load on Michigan's war-busy Telephone System by 1,450 hours of operators' and equipment time each day.

The Telephone System is a vital tool of war production, but it can't be expanded substantially because the required materials have gone to the battle-front.

So please look in the directory first. If the number is not listed and you must call "Information," write it down so you won't have to ask for it again.
